iStock/TeerawatWinyaratGo for cottonThis natural fabric is machine washable and breathable, according to Roberson Keffer, Macy's VP fashion director at home. Long-fiber cottons, such as Egyptian, pime and supima, are the strongest and smoothest, he says. Longer fibers also mean that the tissue is not pilled, so they will feel softer longer. These high-end cotton sheets tend to be more expensive, so it's ok to consider a polycotton, which is usually more affordable than 100 percent cotton - and as a bonus, it gets less wrinkled. Bed linen is also a great natural fiber, according to Keffer. It is especially ideal for summer due to its lighter weight and perspiration, but they are easily wrinkled, even more so than cotton. These are other dream ways to make your bed. Knowing the fabric If too much is invisible to the naked eye, the sheets can be woven differently. The type of tissue affects the softness, appearance, longevity and price of a sheet, according to Real Simple. I prefer percale sheets, says Keffer. They are lighter in weight, crunchy, and stay colder through the night. Many people also like sateen for their soft feeling. Look for the finish Sheets are often treated with chemicals to make sure they don't wrinkle or lose their shape. That said, some manufacturers make organic cotton sheets with a pure finish, which means it is free of chemicals. Although organic plates can wrinkle more easily than the chemical alternative, many consumers prefer the organic option. This is a real personal choice, keffer points out. We recommend feeling the sheet in person and deciding what you prefer before buying. Here are other ways to make your bed cozier. A high thread count is not all that reading count, the number of threads in every square inch of fabric, was once considered the most important measure of quality, but now we know better. Things like yarn fiber, size, finish and spinning play a very important role in the overall quality of a sheet, according to Keffer. As Real Simple explains, a better quality fiber sheet with a lower thread count will feel softer and will rise to wash better than a sheet of lower quality fiber with a higher thread count. It matters where french and Italian manufactured sheets are known as some of the best bed linen manufacturers in the business, according to huffingtonpost.com. However, as Keffer says, it is important to note that every country that makes sheets produces a broad spectrum, so the price can be a basic guide on what you are buying. Think about the environmental impact It's a bit complicated. According to a study published by the Yale Environment Review, although chemical finishes in sheets have a negative environmental impact, their finish is easy to care for, which is usually applied to mixing plates prolongs the shelf life of sheets, leading to an 87 percent decrease in environmental impacts. The same research also points out that cotton is a water-intensive material, so although it may seem more environmentally friendly synthetic fabric such as polyester, gobs and water gobs are needed to manufacture. Ultimately, the study concludes that sheets composed of slightly dyed cotton-polyester mixtures, hairstyles with easy care are ideal for consumers who prioritize environmental impact. Understanding the pros and cons of wrinkle-free leaves Wrinkle-free sheets are not essential, it's about personal preference, keffer says. The downside is that you won't have to press to remove wrinkles. The downside is that the chemical process can be worn with multiple washes, so you could end up on the ironing board anyway, or simply deal with wrinkled sheets. Another drawback is the possible health effects of chemical finishing. The New York Times notes: Although not obvious from the label, the antiwrinkle finish comes from a resin that releases formaldehyde, the chemical that is usually associated with embalmed liquids or dissected frogs in biology class. People with skin allergies may be sensitive to formaldehyde. Think about the increase If you have a mattress topper that significantly increases the height of your mattress, it may make sense to buy sheets that are very deep. That way, you'll have an easier time putting them on. Be sure to measure the depth of the mattress and mattress topper before selecting the size. Always wash the plates before bed if you decide to go with a non-organic finish, make sure to wash the sheets before using them if you have sensitivities or allergies to certain chemicals. In addition, Keffer suggests that washing the plates before using them allows the threads to bloom and creates a softer sensation. This is what happens if bed linen is not washed every week.
